Imagine if your journey to work was from your bedroom to your living room. More and more people in the UK are doing their jobs at home.

Baz works as an engineer in a West London factory. He's been an engineer since he left school, but he's not very optimistic about his future. Heavy industry(工业) in the UK has almost disappeared. More people work in Indian restaurants than in steel, coal and shipbuilding put together! Baz also often gets tired of his long journey to work. Whether he travels by car or by public transport, it can take up to two hours a day.

His sister, Liz, lives in the north of England. She's an Information Technology (IT) trainer at a Baz's wife, Helen, seldom travels to work at all. She's a graphic(图表, 图画)designer for a London advertising company. Once she's got the children off to school, she starts work in front of her computer screen. She's now designing publicity material for a major London festival. When she's finished her designs, she sends them to her director on the Internet. He works from home too, sometimes they meet up for a coffee.

Most people in the UK, like Baz, spend hours travelling to work, and complain about it, too. But the number of people working as telecommuters(远程工作者)is getting larger and larger, like Helen or Liz. Almost all of their work is done online or by phone. There are a million telecommuters in the UK, about 10 percent of the workforce.

The game of Go is one of the four most popular games in Chinese culture. It is not only a competitive(竞争的)event of the mind, but also a board game of entertainment(娱乐).

Go was created in China more than 4,000 years ago. Now many people around the world have shown great interest in it, too.

Moreover, Go is still used as a way of cultural exchange among the people in many Eastern and Western countries today.

The game of Go has many meanings for real life. It represents a square world of round pieces in black and white. While the board is fixed, the pieces can be placed in millions of different ways, just as life in the real world may take many turns. The proper placement of each tiny Go piece is the same as how one might solve a difficult problem in life.

Go carries deeper cultural and competitive meanings. In the game of Go, the players do not wipe out(消灭)each other's pieces. Instead, they simply try to win a larger share of space while allowing the other side some space. The one who makes the other side into a dead corner wins the game.
